Breaking from tribal life by moving downtown

You must have heard the buzz around the development and revitalization of downtown Guelph. With several major condominium projects in the works, there is definitely a current shift for people of all ages condominium projects in the works, there is definitely a current shift for people of all ages to move downtown.

Guelph is not alone in this trend. For the first time, more humans live in cities than in rural areas. The percentage is only set to increase over the century. According to a recent Globe and Mail article, big-box businesses that were normally destined for the outskirts now want to be downtown. It's a shame that it isn't happening in Guelph, but perhaps it's just a matter of time. Douglas Street seems especially spartan, which is unfortunate as the street itself is lined with character-filled buildings crying out for unique businesses to fill them.

Part of why all this resonates so heavily with me is because even in a growing city, we tend to live our lives among a select group of people in closed-off spaces. Through our activities and friends we find community and form tribes, but it is nearly impossible to experience a community that incorporates all of the other inhabitants.

It is that sense of community that feels other inhabitants.

It is that sense of community that feels incomplete to me living in the suburbs, so my family is joining the shift downtown. I work out of a home office and every time I go down town, I feel invigorated by the energy, the feel of neighbourhood, the market, the bakers, cafés and bookstores, and I want to be able to walk everywhere I need to go. When I hit a snag in writing. I want to be able to stroll around the corner and go to one of several cafés to ponder, or pass the time of day with a friend. We have been lucky enough to find a home backing onto the river with its own dock. One of my life goals has been to someday live overlooking water, always imagining it to be a lake, but I'll take the river. My vision mobility on the deck overlooking the river while the church bells chime. Community, connectedness, walking instead of using the car, a view of the water, living near several friends—what more could I want?

Moving means decluttering, sifting through the flotsam and jetsam we have collected over the years. Decluttering experts cafés and bookstores, and I want to be able to lected over the years. Decluttering experts advise us to get rid of the stuff and keep the memories. I have held onto Fisher Price toys for more than 20 years, from when my children were very young, saving them for future grandchildren. Suddenly such sentiment seemed ridiculous and possibly futile. One sive decluttering exercise we had just gone through, adding that the front porch was heaped high with stuff awaiting collection heaped high with stuff awaiting collection from one of the charity agencies to pick it up. An audible gasp was heard on the other end of the phone. She asked me whether the toys remained on the front porch — with urgency in her voice. "Do not talk me out of getting rid of them," I said firmly

In ner voice.
"Do not talk me out of getting rid of them," Isaid firmly.
She immediately switched to unfair tactics. She mentioned how when her grand-children come over, the Fisher Price schoolhouse, garage and barn are their favourite toys because they don't play with them anywhere else. I wondered how she knew exactly what toys were on the porch as I yelled: "Stop it! I need to get rid of them."

She told me to return them to my house, insisting I wouldn't regret doing it. I hung up the phone and went to the porch to retrieve them, knowing she is one wise woman.
We have to do what works for us, and moving downtown is the right thing for right now. Speaking to Mike Swan, the gracious owner of Swan Movers about our upcoming move, he

Swan Movers about our upcoming move, he summed it up perfectly: "So brave of you to move out of your house even though you love it, and move downtown for that bit of spark."
